You may be the parent of someone hoping to go to college or you are off to college yourself. Bad credit scores can affect your ability to get a school loan. Like any other kind of loan, you are expected to pay back the money you borrow in full. Having bad credit makes you a higher risk than those with good credit history. Therefore, you are less likely to be approved for a student loan – no matter the reasons!

School financing is black and white. You either qualify, otherwise you do not.

They are fairly standard procedures throughout the company. This keeps the system fair for everyone hoping to go to college and beyond. However, this does mean that cannot try a private loan company if you are denied a loan.

There are various loans that you can apply for without having to undertake a credit check. But they do not allow you to pay the full amount that you will need for college fees. These loans often come with borrowing limits for both the yearly and total amounts. Most school loans are undertaken through the government. So, you will still be able to fund at least a partial amount of your studies, should you choose to take this route.

Dangerous credit doesn't mean higher interest rates. It means that you're not attending to get approved.

Entering a loan with a guarantor to the pay the fees if you fall behind on your payments is another option. Again, using a guarantor is a good route if you are certain you will be able to pay the loan back in full. As a lender, you run the risk of putting undue strain on the relationship with whoever agrees to be your guarantor.

Unfortunately, student loans are a place in your life where your bad credit can have an impact on other people you care about. If you are the parent of a child going to college, your student will often rely on you to support them. This could be with a loan or signing on as their guarantor. In this case, making good credit history becomes even more important.
