Chapter 1 - The Hall

1 - The Hall

The room was silent, but seemed as if it wanted to tell a long and painful story to me about its past, it had this strange feeling of power and strength including its glamorous and posh side; I guess this side wasn't shown much because to any normal person's eyes a lot of dead animal heads across wood panelled walls would seem pretty strange but maybe to a hunter it proved that the owner had this strange but glamorously strong way. One of the most interesting parts of the room was the room's fireplace, it wasn't a usual coal lit fireplace - dull but warm - it was a large, marvellous, marbled fireplace guarded by the eyes of two fantastic looking dragons; the effect of the roaring fire made the dragons' mouths fire up and the fierce and gashing flames looked like you had just slipped a glance of a realistic fire breathing dragon. Walking around the room over to the animal heads to see their poor distressed faces I could see the dragons' beady eyes watching and following my every movement. As I stood back and examined the room I saw that the carpet was a colour of blood leaking and disgusting its red looks seemed like the owner wanted a statement of power but not to me it gave a state of uneasiness I felt scared to think of this to be realistic and not just a horrible nightmare. Still examining the room I saw the ugly and dull furniture maybe in some way it was posh but it seemed not to look it was just an object in the room nothing special. As I kept looking I saw this rug from which I thought looked a bit like a zebra I wasn't too surprised by the fact that when I walked closer I realised I was right and that it was real. Staring across the ceiling I saw a beautiful creation a chandelier with at least 100 bulbs on. I turned to notice the door creaking open I then realised someone was coming I had to straighten up...
