Whatever. I thought I'd end up like this anyway. At least that's what I tried to convince myself...

0 - Prolouge

You know how people always wish for immortality? How people fear death no matter who they are? I would LOVE to die. Please. I can't stand it any longer than I have to, and I've been this way for... Well, a long time. At the end of the day, when people snuggle warm and content under blankets, I am in the woods, trying to meet my match. If only the moon would lead me to the one person who could destroy me. The one thing that could destroy me. Love. That is all I want, and all I fear. It is all I daydream about, and all I cringe at when thinking of it. Love.

Oh no. I never thought that this day would actually come. I had forced it out of my mind, and for a while, it had dissapeared. But now it was time, and I trudged up the steps of the large, empty house. I'd heard about the house many times before from my father, who was all too excited about it. I almost smiled, remembering the extatic mood he was in when he found out that we were going to live there. Of course, I'm 13, so I don't really understand all of that financial talk my parents were using. I grimaced at the house, as if it had just made a witty remark. It happened too fast, I thought. The minute I became a vampire, and finally felt that I could fit in with the world around me, we had to move practically across the country. I sighed. It was cold. Not that it mattered to me, since my skin is always icy and hard, but I noticed a bitter edge to the frigid weather. I looked upon this as an omen. Sighing once more, I bit my lip and opened the rather noisy front door.
